Kathleen ThiemeKathleen Thieme is a commercial intern for Today.com. Amazon constantly adjusts prices on its products. If you have time to wait for a good offer, you can follow the prices on the things you want (and even get alerts) using a website called CamelCamelCamel, and its extension of the Camelizer browser. CamelCamelCamel records price changes for more than 18 million products on Amazon. It's especially useful if you want to buy something that goes on sale often or that often changes the price. Just plug in the PRODUCT URL you want to track, and you'll see if now is a good time to buy or not, based on your pricing history. If you don't want to pull out another website to search for every item you want to buy, you can download the Camelizer spo for Chrome, Firefox, and Safari. This lets you access CamelCamelCamel data while browsing the Amazon — click the Camelizer icon on the toolbar or paste the URL on the site to see the pricing graphs. Regardless of whether prefer to use alone or extension, there are a few things you can do with CamelCamelCamel data. Let's start by looking at these graphs. These graphs will show you the price of an item that you watch over time. There are three color bars each representing a different type of seller on Amazon: Amazon (Green): This green line represents the price for the product if it is dispatched and sold from Amazon directly. New third party (blue): This blue line tracks sales from all third-party vendors, but only if the product being sold is brand new. Third party used (red): The final, red line shows the price of second-hand items sold from third-party vendors. Of course, each of these lines has some changes. If you can get a better deal by buying used, you'll see at first glance from the chart. You can also see if third parties are offering any better deals. In the example below, I follow the price of the Panasonic camera. Typically, third-party vendors aren't cheaper than Amazon for this camera when new ones are sold, but second-hand cameras are often cheaper. In fact, you could save about $120 if you bought a used unit, which is the lowest second-hand unit in a long time. That said, CamelCamelCamel can only follow prices, so you may find some cases where this information is misled. In the case of this camera, the price is so low for the second-hand version because this vendor does not include a lens. Some customers may be fine with buying a camera without a lens (for example, if they already have a set of lenses), but it's a nınca that CamelCamelCamel data can't show. Always make sure to double-check the products you compare when catching a business. There are a few additional options on the chart side (or at the bottom of the Camelizer window) that you can tweak to help you browse your pricing history. The Date Range option will narrow the price history to one month, three months, six months, year, or all times. Under Chart Options, you can disable Close Up View to run the axis on the chart's price side to zero (if you're overpressed for such things), and Remove Extreme Values to filter any upward prices or falls that are so extreme that they are likely to be errors. CamelCamelCamel can also set price alerts to find out when the next product goes on sale. For this case, we're going to look at the Amazon echo. Amazon is the only primary seller for this item, so you can turn off 3rd party trackers (unless you want to buy one used). We're going to get a file that looks like this one. We just missed the sale! Looks like it was pretty big, too. Typically, the Echo is $180, but recently it fell to $130. It's not a bad thing. This isn't the first sale this year. If we're patient, we'll probably find another sale before the year is over. In order to trace this, we can set a price warning. First, enter the target price in the column you want next to the type of price you want to track (Amazon, Third Party, or Used). The page will be select shortcuts of shortcuts you want to know when a point drops below a certain threshold, such as 3%, 5%, or 10% (the extension offers different thresholds such as 10%, 25%, or 50% discount and so on). If the price of the item falls but does not drop below the threshold you have specified, you will not hear about it. Then enter the email address where you want to receive alerts. In addition, you can create a CamelCamelCamel account (or sign in with Google, Twitter or Facebook) so you don't have to enter an email address every time. When you're done, click Start Tracking (or Create Pricing Hours) in the extension. That's all there! Just sit down and wait and you'll get an email the next time your item will be on sale for the price you're willing to accept. Remember, not every deal will appear in camelCamelCamel data. The site cannot follow promo codes and most Lightning Deals will not appear in camelCamelCamel data. However, it is still convenient enough for a daily job hunting. (Picture credit: Shutterstock) Christmas Eve has arrived and if you're still out with some presents, we have good news. Amazon is extending many of its last-minute deals through the holidays and many negotiations can still ship and arrive by Christmas. Items with the same delivery date include everything from cheap Fire Tablet to various Bose headphones. There's a catch: You have to live in a city where Amazon offers same-day delivery courtesy of its Prime Now delivery service. It also helps to be a first member. Prime members get free same-day delivery delivery at an order price of $35 or more. Non-Prime members pay $9.98 for the item. (You can sign up for free testing if you are not already a member and cancel before it is renewed). You'll also need to sign in to your Amazon account to see your shipping options. (If you're not signed in, you won't see the text arrives before Christmas). So stay indoors, get rid of crowded stores and check out the best Amazon deals with the same day's delivery from the comfort of your home.
